Marty Morell

Marty Morell has played drums and percussion in every conceivable music setting. After classical studies at Julliard, he found success in the jazz world performing and recording with the Al Cohn-Zoot Sims Quintet, Steve Kuhn, Gary McFarland, and Bill Evans. Marty toured with the Duke Ellington Orchestra, performed for Broadway musicals, and is currently on the faculty of the University of Central Florida Music Department.

Marty was interviewed in Orlando, Florida on February 24, 2017 by Monk Rowe, Director of the Fillius Jazz Archive.

MR: My name is Monk Rowe and we are in Orlando, Florida, and I'm very privileged to have Marty Morell with me today. And I'm going to introduce you as a man who wears lots of hats, including the cap you have on today.

MM: Yeah. I'm a hat man.

MR: Yeah. And drummer/percussionist/vibist band leader, teacher.

MM: Yeah, yeah. Professor. At the University of Central Florida.

MR: Yeah. Did you have a career path as a young man that was inspired by something?

MM: Not really. I just knew that I wanted to be a musician, at a very early age, 14 years old. I went to a big show at the Paramount Theater on Broadway. And I was just in awe. I saw the drummer up there playing. It was Alan Freed, I don't know if you have any rock & roll fans.

MR: Oh sure.

MM: And it was just a great show, right. And the back-up band I was watching, my eyes was fixated on that drummer. I said wow, this is so cool. I want to do that.

MR: That's where they'd have guys come out and do a couple of hits and the bands would back them up. Right? And then the next guy would come out.

MM: Right. Right. Frankie Lymon and the Teenagers, and the Platters, and Chuck Berry even was on that show, and Frankie Lymon and the Teenagers. Did I say that already?

MR: Right. Frankie Lymon. Yeah.

MM: And yeah that was it. I knew right then and there. It was 1958. I had started playing drums in school and I said that's it, that's it for me. And then actually what really was the kind of final decision-maker was I got my first gig, right? And the gig paid ten dollars, right? And I tell this story to my friends and they laugh because this guy I was playing with was an accordionist. He calls me and he says, "Marty, Marty, I got a gig, we got a gig." And I said, "Great. How much does it pay?" He says, "It pays eight dollars." And I me, and I'm always asking for more money today. But actually he did pay me the ten bucks.

MR: It's worth asking.

MM: So then after that we did a second gig, like a month later, right? For the Knights of Columbus and it was a dance and everything. And I made 25 dollars.

MR: What year would this have been?

MM: That would have been 1958.

MR: And that's not a bad amount of money.

MM: Listen, my dad was making 60 dollars a week in those days. And that was a pretty good gig. For me to make 25 dollars, not only that but I was playing music and they fed us a great meal. And I said man sign me up, this is it, I'm in, I'm totally in.

MR: So what was the song list like on that kind of gig?

MM: Oh you know the old standards, "Don't Blame Me," "Foggy Day." Like all those old show tunes.

MR: If someone had come up and said can you guys play a rumba, would you have known what to do at that point?

MM: Yes.

MR: Why?

MM: Well because this accordionist friend of mine, he actually taught me some rhythms. Because he was working at a studio, the Joe Biviano Accordion Studio in Manhattan. Right? And there was a drum teacher there. And he went and he got the information from the drum teacher, and the drum teacher taught him and then he taught me.

MR: That's neat. Because you don't always have to learn from people who are playing the same instrument as you.

MM: Right, right, right. So he was a great friend. That was my first musical experience, like working professionally, right. And the thing for me is that I felt very natural. It came easily. I could always hear rhythms and hear what to do as a drummer, right? And the people ask me why are you a musician, you know. And I say I became a musician by default. Because I wasn't good at anything else. Music was what I was good at. And so I developed a sense of identity in music, like really early.

MR: Were your parents supportive of this path?

MM: Yeah, yeah they were. My dad and my mom — she's Puerto Rican. She used to sing in Puerto Rico as a young girl and actually she loved music. And my dad, see my dad was a businessman and he said, "Look, okay. You want to be a musician that's great. But get an education." And I said, "Okay. That sounds good." So then I followed that path and I went to Manhattan School of Music and I studied at Juilliard, percussion at Juilliard, and MR: Did it ever occur to you to become a percussionist in a classical symphony orchestra?

MM: Well at the time, when I was in school I played with the National Orchestral Society there in Manhattan. It was an orchestra of all the students from Juilliard, Columbia University and a lot of the music departments. So I played with the orchestra. And I thought wow, this is great. I was kind of enthralled with that beautiful sound you know, orchestral sound. But I was in a percussion section, I was one of maybe five or six guys. And this was during the school year. And then on holidays and in the summers I was doing little gigs like up in the Catskill Mountains and I started having fun doing that. And I said wow, this is a lot cooler. This is fun. You know. This is easy. So and of course I started playing shows, early, right. So I was reading charts at 14, 15 years old. So you know, I was getting that kind of experience. And I was making money doing it. You know, so you become a professional musician to earn a living. So it seemed like I just naturally rolled into that position.

MR: There's a lot of down time when you're a percussionist in an orchestra, isn't there?

MM: Absolutely. You count like a hundred bars and you get ready to play your two little triangle notes, right, then the conductor stops and says, "Okay let's take it back to Letter A." Then you've got to count all over again while you're waiting like that. So I mean it was exciting. At the time it was really exciting. And I really enjoyed it. I really learned a lot. Of course I was just auxiliary percussion. You know, I played cymbals and bass drum and suspended cymbal, triangle, wood block, that kind of thing. Some standard. But the percussion section was headed by Morris Goldenberg, who was a percussion teacher at Juilliard and at Manhattan. He had students from both schools. So he was the head of the percussion department there and the orchestra. The National Orchestral Society. In New York. And so I mean it was great experience to be there under his guidance.

MR: I want to take you back to the Alan Freed show. I'm sort of fascinated by that period where music was moving from basically swing-based to straight eighth notes. Were you aware of that — both sides of that coin?

MM: Yes somewhat. People ask me how do you think it got to where it was straight? Like straight eighth notes. Well I think perhaps Latin music is more eighth note based, like a cha cha, which is [scats] right? And that music kind of infiltrated the musical scene, right? And so the combination of the two, you know and then they started to add those elements and perhaps that how the even eighth note feel got started. And then another possibility is that, you know playing swing is kind of a difficult, it's difficult to get that feel, right? And maybe some drummers thought it was easier, they started playing on the eighth note side, or like those early days [scats] like a shuffle kind of, early, early rhythm & blues, right? So it might have morphed into a more even eighth feel, right? So it's a

MR: Is there such a thing as playing behind the beat or ahead of the beat?

MM: Well you hear that a lot. I think the main thing is finding where it grooves. Where is feels best. You know, and certain tunes, you know, like in the Ellington band, right, I had the good fortune to work with the Ellington band for about six years, six and a half years. And you know it's a more laid back kind of feel, like especially like something like "Jeep's Blues" or even "Satin Doll" with that band – it's laid back but it really grooves. And it's not really behind the beat but it's just in a place where it really feels good, right? And then it depends on the tempo. I mean you're not going to lay back if you're playing an uptempo. You know what I mean? It's the tempo that's pushing you forward so you've got to keep driving it, right? But certain kinds of music lend themselves to a little bit more laid back style, right? And that's kind of how I approach it. But basically you just try to get it feeling good, wherever it sits. And that's the place I try to get to, every time I play.

MR: Is it partly the bass player you're working with that — well let me rephrase – It seems like there'd be bass players that you work better with and some that it just doesn't jive.

MM: That's true. But for the most part if a guy's a professional then you just kind of take care of your job description. And you try to make the music feel good. Right? That's what a bass player and a drummer are supposed to do together. They're supposed to work together as a team. If you get clashing egos that could be a problem. Right? But I believe that when you play music you've got to leave your ego home, and you need to serve the music and forget about your own personal agenda. And your agenda should be to make that particular music sound and feel as good as you can, especially in a rhythm section. Right. So yeah, there's some bass players that I love playing with for certain kinds of music. When I was with the Ellington band Hassan Shakur, the bass player, he played with that band for over 35 years. And he works with Monty Alexander now. And he actually won Ted Mack's Amateur Hour – he was three years old playing bass. Do you remember that show?

MR: I do.

MM: So, but he is just, for that kind of music he is just the best. He's the easiest and it's so easy to play with him, especially those Ellington style grooves. And it was a pleasure to work with him.

MR: It's interesting that the band has retained that – or retained that kind of feel with some of the key players having passed away or whatever. You don't have Johnny Hodges there anymore but if they're still laying back as you say.

MM: Well the thing is that that band is actually from the original times when Duke started it, right, so it would go along and when somebody died, that position got filled, right? So the guys that had worked with Duke still stayed in the band so it was kind of always passing the flag to the next person. So there was a certain way to play in that band and that's what — if you could do that then you got the gig, that type of thing. Right? So I'm honored to have been part of that Ellington legacy even though – actually I worked with Barry Lee Hall. Barry Lee Hall unfortunately passed away a few years ago. He was a trumpet player and he worked with Ellington. All right? So he was the last connection. And also Rocky White, the drummer, Duke Ellington himself hired Rocky, right? And he was with the band for 35, 38 years, something like that. So to get a position in that band somebody has to die. Then you get a position.

MR: That's right. There's this – Ellington never fired anyone I guess, at least that's what I've read.

MM: Well I guess that's true because if the cats accepted you or wanted you then you're up to the task, you're up to playing the right way. So I actually resigned about four or five years ago, because I thought I want to leave on my own terms. I'm not going to wait until I die.

MR: I have other things I can do.

MM: Well actually I just didn't want to do the traveling anymore and I thought it was better for the band to get somebody that could do all the gigs. Actually last year I did a few gigs. They were here in Florida and the drummer couldn't make it so I filled in.

MR: Oh. Nice.

MM: Yeah, you get tired of the traveling.

MR: Do you ever have any problems figuring out what to play behind the bass solo? There have been a lot of bad jokes floating around about uh oh here comes the bass solo, everybody's going to start talking.

MM: Yeah, yeah yeah. That's true.

MR: And it's true because everybody tends to stop and the bass player's got to like carry the whole thing. And when I think about, gee if I was a drummer, I don't know what I would do either.

MM: Well the main thing is you just kind of keep the groove going. I know when I played with Hassan with Ellington, he always liked it when I played, just keep a nice background feel happening. You're not going to get too busy or too loud, because you don't want to cover him up you know. But you know, once in a while the pianist would drop in a couple of things and it's nice. It makes it an interesting bass solo, right? You know, I just kind of follow along, any soloist. But you've got to take into consideration the volume, you know, and usually play on the hi hat type of thing. Although when I was working with Eddie Gomez and Bill Evans, I played straight ahead. Like it was a more modern kind of with his technique and everything. So I played behind him as though I was playing behind a sax or something. So that was a different, of course that was a different style altogether. Right? So you've got to always take that into consideration too you know, whatever style, whatever tune, whatever groove you're playing that also figures into how you handle playing drums behind a bass solo.

MR: Did Bill Evans ever give you instructions or things he'd like to hear. Could you do this instead of what you're doing?

MM: No.

MR: Did you hear much from him?

MM: Never. Absolutely. The only thing he said to me one time was, "You know you might think about adding a third cymbal, just to maybe get a different – to be able to switch over to a different sound." I had a ride cymbal and I actually had what at the time was a flat ride made by Paiste, right? That's a particular sound and it's never overpowering. And actually I switched to – this is kind of a funny story. I met Bill's mother at the Kennedy Center when we did a concert there. And there was a little reception afterwards and I met Bill's mother, right? And Bill introduces me, and she said, oh, the first thing she said to me, "The drums are too loud. I couldn't hear Bill." That was all I remember. She didn't say oh hi, how are you, nothing. So I guess I did, I took it to heart and then I heard about these flat ride cymbals and I got a deal with Paiste at the time and I started endorsing Paiste cymbals. And they made the flat ride. So I picked one up. And that's the cymbal that's on pretty much all the recordings that I did with Bill. I used that flat ride. And it made it really easy in the concert hall, I could dig in and I never really kind of smeared up the cover of the piano, that had a lot of definition too. So it made it easy.

MR: Yeah. It's got to be hard to like dig in but not play – but not at the same time.

MM: Right, right. Actually now I think I have more control where I can do that easier. Back then, that youthful kind of energy where you just want to go for it all the time you know. It just made it easier. I could free up, I didn't have to worry about playing too loud.

MR: Yeah. I think I've read, or heard, seen, that you were well prepared for that gig before you got it because you had like checked them out seriously.

MM: Well the thing is I became a huge fan of Bill Evans. I first heard "Portrait in Jazz" in maybe 1961, something like that. And a bass player friend of mine in high school, he played it for me and I said, "Wow, this is the most beautiful music I ever heard." And I became a huge fan. And the next day I went out and bought whatever I could find, like LPs right? And I started to listen to Bill, a lot, the early trio with Scott LaFaro and Paul Motian, right? And all the cats at that time were just in love with that trio. It was just the most beautiful thing to hit the scene. So it was my favorite jazz group at the time. And I presented itself, so I had the chance to play with Bill at the Vanguard. He was auditioning drummers. So I went down and played on a Thursday night, and anything he played, I knew his book. So I think that kind of surprised him. Anything he threw me, and then after the gig he said, "Wow it sounds like you've been playing with us for a long time." And I said, "In some ways I have." Because I listened so much. And it seemed like everything clicked. It was one of those nights where everything worked and it was really nice. So the next day his manager called me and he said, "Do you have a passport?" So I knew then that I had the gig. So it was nice. It was a thrill. It really was. It was a great time.

MR: Was it hard to watch, he had health problems through those years, right?

MM: Yeah.

MR: Was it hard to watch that?

MM: Well through those years you would never know it. Bill was always very cool and always seemed in control of everything. He was a gentleman, he was very – took care of business, you know. I think it was later on actually, it got a little bit, or maybe — I would have never known. I knew through the other cats that told me. It wasn't really that obvious. But I guess just before he got on the methadone program you could see that he was a little bit – it was becoming an even bigger problem.

MR: Did it affect his playing at that point, that you knew?

MM: Not really. Not really. And I think if he was feeling sick it might have affected his playing a little bit you know. But he always took care of business. He was very professional that way. He always, you know, honored any contract or any engagement and he would always make sure that he took care of what needed to be taken care of.

MR: Yeah.

MM: Very responsible that way.

MR: It's unfortunate that jazz, especially in the 50s and somewhat in the 60s I guess, was associated with drug abuse and all that. And sometimes I tell people well look where people went to work. They went to work in a bar very often, and the surroundings.

MM: Back then they didn't know, like what they know now about excessive use of those drugs. Back then they didn't really – it's the same thing with smoking. Everybody smoked, right? Now like 60 or 70 years later, "Oh man it's really bad. You shouldn't smoke." You know. But back then everybody was smoking. So, and I just finished reading the Miles Davis autobiography. And it goes into all that with Charlie Parker and Bud Powell and all that stuff. And, but what those guys were going through, it's terrible. I mean it'd break your heart when you read some of that. And, you know, you say well no wonder why they self-medicated. You know? Just to get through. It was a very difficult

MR: Did you resign from the trio?

MM: Yeah. I did.

MR: Was there a reason for that?

MM: Well again, I was tired of the road and I wanted to expand, trying to do some different things. You know I loved Bill, I loved the music, but I also financially it wasn't the best. Okay? It was, I survived. It was okay. But I knew I had abilities and I wanted to be able to buy a house and plan for the future a little bit, and I knew I couldn't do that if I'd stayed on the road with Bill Evans. And after almost seven years I thought —

MR: It's a long time to do anything actually. Well if you don't mind my asking, what was your typical – were you on a salary?

MM: Well, you know, back then, you know let's see, we worked at the top of the Gate or the Vanguard or something like that, you know, it was a hundred and thirty bucks a week.

MR: A hundred thirty bucks a week.

MM: But my rent was a hundred thirty dollars a month.

MR: Yeah, still, that's —

MM: Pretty meager.

MR: Yeah, that's a quarter of your –

MM: Yeah 25 percent. But the thing is, and then we'd do concerts, and that would pay a little bit more. If we'd go to Europe he could pay me more. But really, in 19, let's see, my last year with Bill was 1974, I mean I think I made $15,000 for the year.

MR: And you got paid for recordings but you probably didn't get —

MM: Royalties, no, no, no.

MR: Residuals?

MM: No nothing like that.

MR: Got paid for the date.

MM: But since, you know, my Bill Evans days, some recordings have come out, there are some tapes that were in the closet type of thing. And so I did get paid for those, which is kind of nice. But that's how it was. You know like he had a story from Jimmy Cobb all the time, he recorded "Kind of Blue" you know and got $60 for the recording date. And it's the biggest selling jazz recording in history. But that's how things were set up. It was for the artist, the main artist. Right? And if you were a musician you got paid scale, union scale whatever it was for a record date and you know, that's just the way it is.

MR: Have you read this Peter Pettinger? What he said about you? "Unsung stalwart of piano trio history." That's you. "Responsible for an exceedingly tight unit that could swing and drive relentlessly. His control of the 12-bar sections in a number like 'Twelve Tone Tune' for instance, snappy and precise as could be."

MR: Snappy.

MM: Very English. That's very English.

MR: That's right.

MM: Rather snappy.

MR: Yes. So you moved on. And I'm wondering about what you do now with your teaching. If you look at your resume, you've done everything from the piano trio to studio work to leading your own band, to playing big band, jingles. Can you impart to your students what you have to do to be ready for to make a living in music?

MM: Well that's exactly what we – that's our main focus in the UCF jazz program, all our students. And you know, if you get a good jazz education, because to play jazz well you really need to have your instrument under control, you need to be a really strong musician to play jazz well, right? You've got to know, you have to have good technique, you have to know a lot about music theory, especially like horn players. And we make sure our drummers, they take jazz theory and they would take ear training with them and they have to learn tunes, have to play them on the piano, stuff like that. So we want them to be full musicians as well. So, and when you get this kind of solid foundation in jazz and learning jazz, it's a very difficult form of music to learn how to play well. I think you can take that and go any direction in the music business, and bring a lot to the table, if you just focus on that particular area. That's one of the reasons why I left Bill, you know, because I wanted to try to do studio work. I wanted to learn different styles. So I thought well if I could play good enough to play with Bill Evans, I should be able to take that energy and focus it somewhere else and perhaps like I should be able to do that too if I put my mind to it. So, you know, if you have a good jazz foundation I think, and you are well educated in that, on your instrument, in that style right, and have gone through all the studying and everything, you should be able to fall into any situation that's out there. Really. If you're interested, well, and also you've got to do the homework. You've got to do your research.

MR: Who were the important rhythm sections to you that you tell your students, "You've got to check this out?"

MM: Well for a big band I've always loved Mel Lewis and Richard Davis and Roland Hanna and the early Thad Jones-Mel Lewis big band. That was a great rhythm section. And then, you know, the other big band style, I love Buddy Rich and what he brings to the table. Okay. Because he had a lot of different bass players and stuff. But he was the driving force of any band that he fronted. So you played with him or else. Right? And I love Elvin Jones and Jimmy Garrison and McCoy Tyner and that kind of Coltrane out style, you know. Because I love Elvin. Elvin was one of my all-time favorite drummers,

Williams and Herbie Hancock, that's a whole other rhythm section. I mean there's all kinds of different rhythm sections out there. So I can't say I have a favorite. There's lots of different rhythm sections with different kinds of music that were happening that now I tell my students, "Go on YouTube and check it out." That's the beautiful thing, they can go on YouTube and they can, everything's there to watch and see.

MR: Yeah.

MM: Back in the day I think a good portion would go to Birdland and different clubs and I could see them live you know. But on YouTube they could check out a hundred years of music.

MR: Speaking of that, I wanted to play something new that you're on.
[audio interlude]

MM: Oh that's Claus Ogerman right.

MR: This is Takana.

MM: Oh yes.

MR: I love this.

MM: That's actually Bill's solo verbatim. She transcribed, she played the whole thing.

MR: That's really nice. That must be an interesting experience for you, because you played with him and now you're playing this —

MM: Yeah. That was a fun gig, Takana Miyamoto. And we went to Japan and it was actually on that tour that I met my wife.

MR: Outstanding.

MM: And we did a Bill Evans tribute kind of tour we did over there. Concerts. And she is a wonderful pianist. Great. And that one, she just transcribed it and played it verbatim, the entire solo.

MR: And did you try to play verbatim?

MM: No. I don't remember from one day to the next what I played the last time.

MR: But you — the recordings I picked out to listen to, I'm not sure how to say this. You like to double things up a lot or frequently.

MM: Double things up.

MR: Double things up by for instance, that piece it seems like you could have been playing – you were fairly busy on the snare drum with the brushes. I guess that's what I mean.

MM: Right, right. Well that's kind of what I hear, and that's very stylistic, Bill Evans' style.

MR: Yeah.

MM: And it's a conversation rather than an accompaniment.

MR: Oh, okay.

MM: You know what I mean? It's kind of a conversation rather than just – and that's basically rhythm section kind of style, right? Where they were three musicians having a conversation rather than the bass and the drummer accompanying the piano player. Right? So that's where the door started opening for the role of the drummer and the bass player, the interaction in the rhythm section.

MR: I like that because it sounded like a ballad and an uptempo tune at the same time to me.

MM: Well yeah. That's a beautiful piece of music. That's Claus Ogerman.

MR: I was going to say boy, you played with him and you played with Don Sebesky, who is one of my favorite writers. Cool.

MM: Yeah. I did a lot of dates with, we're playing one of his charts, Sammy Nestico.

MR: Oh yeah.

MM: Yeah he used to come up – I lived in, you probably know I lived in Canada for about 25 years and he used to come up to do projects up there, and fortunately he always asked for me in the rhythm section, so that was pretty nice. And I did a lot of dates and sessions with Sammy. Sammy is a great writer. Amazing writer.

MR: Yeah. Neat guy too.

MM: Yeah. He's a sweetheart. He's still active, he's like 92 or 93 or something, still writing. It's amazing.

MR: And Broadway shows and being in the pit, a whole other focus. Not only playing time but being on time and the structure of it.

MM: Right. Well you know I like the steadiness of it, right? And financially it's good money. And also it's the whole union contracts so it's all pension. And I learned about that early, and I wanted to make sure that I could get those kind of gigs so I'd have some retirement. Right? And I'm glad I did. Not only was it fun musically, I mean it was cool playing with a 28-piece orchestra every night and playing the show. It was a lot of fun. I mean you need to be disciplined and, you know, you can't cut loose or whatever, you know you have to play the gig the way it's meant to be played. It's almost the same every night. But I like that it was kind of, for me, stress free. You know you just go in, you don't have to deal with people in the club or something like that, you're in the pit, nobody really sees you, you do your gig and then you go home. And you can have kind of a normal life. And the money's good.

MR: I've heard and seen some things about how a drummer I know said he did a show once and he wasn't even in the pit, he was in another room watching the conductor on a monitor.

MM: A monitor? Yeah. I've done that.

MR: Have you done that?

MM: I've done that. Yes. With earphones. That's kind of weird. I haven't done that too much there's not enough room. So they've got to rig something up in the back there and put a drummer and percussionist in another room. Right? But actually if you have a good sound man, right, and they give you a good mix, it sounds like you're playing on a recording every night. I mean it sounds great. You have good earphones and it sounds like you're right in the middle of a beautifully-recorded CD.

MR: Yeah.

MM: Now if you have a sound man that doesn't know what he's doing then it could be really funky you know, it could be a disaster. But if you have a good mix it can be pretty nice.

MR: What's the worst gig you ever played?

MM: The worst gig.

MR: Sometimes I use this question and usually it's hard to remember.

MM: Well fortunately I haven't had too many that were bad. Of course early on I did a gig at a place called the Idea Longue in the Bronx. And it was drums and a guitar – two guitars. And the two guitar players were sitting or standing, like it was kind of a U-shaped bar and they're standing in the middle of the bar, and the drums are on a riser out on the other side of the bar, right? So I'm playing and a guy comes in and he hangs his coat on my cymbal. Right? Of course I was like 17, 18 years old or something like that. And do you know the drummer Pete Magadini?

MR: I've seen the name, yeah.

MM: Well Pete is a friend of mine. And he told me he actually worked the Idea Lounge too. And we exchanged stories about the place. But I can't remember the worst gig I ever played. Fortunately they just kept getting better and better, like early. And I always enjoyed my work. I always enjoyed the next gig. You know, if there are any that were bad, I can't even remember.

MR: Yeah. It's just a day at work and tomorrow will be another.

MM: Exactly. You know I tell this story to some of my students. When I first moved to Canada this piano player called me to work on a gig at a Holiday Inn. And I was new in town so I didn't have a whole bunch of work right away. But he was doing this gig, and he had to do an hour show behind an Irish singer who played ukulele and a bunch of drunk Irish people. And he called me and said, "I just thought on the outside chance that maybe you'd want to fill in for my drummer for two weeks." And he explained about the gig, right. And we could play two tunes before the show. And he said, "I'd love to work with you." And I said, "Sure." I wasn't doing anything. You know. And he was really a nice guy. So I went and did the gig and you know, made a few bucks, did two weeks and made a friend and we hung out, we played a couple of tunes before, and it was nice. I mean we were laughing during the show and it was kind of a joke really. But sometimes make friends with somebody. So at the end of the two weeks we parted, that was it. A couple of years later he calls me and he says, "Marty are you available to do, I just booked a TV show series and I'm going to be Musical Director and I'd love for you to do the series." And I said, "Sure, yeah." So meanwhile that gig made a bunch of money. And I said, "Thank you so much." He said, "You were the first person I thought of to call."

MR: Wow. All those years later.

MM: Yeah. And that's kind of a karma thing. So I tell that story to my students. So you know if you bring something good, you know, it's about the human experience, you know what I mean, and that's more important. And we're musicians and sometimes we have to share something that's kind of funky but the sun will rise the next morning you know what I mean? And it's only four hours of the day. And it's what we do, we're musicians. So okay, something else will come along that's better.

MR: Yes. I sometimes think of the people that work eight hours a day at something that they really dislike.

MM: Absolutely.

MR: And then you compare what we do.

MM: Right. Right.

MR: It puts things in perspective.

MM: Absolutely. Absolutely. And you know I always appreciated having work and being able to do what I do to make a living. And I think that if you approach your work with a positive kind of an attitude, I think good things kind of fall into place. It's kind of the way I am. It wasn't that I had a motive or something – like oh this guy's going to call me for a TV show. I never thought about that. You know what I mean? But it's important to enjoy the people that you work with and that's what's nice about our business. It's a very social kind of thing. And for me that was more than — and he was a fine writer, I could tell he was a good piano player and a really good musician. And he had to pay his bills so he was doing this gig, right?

MR: A gig is a gig.

MM: A gig is a gig. That's just the way it is. So I mean fortunately I think if you play your cards right everything works out and something good comes out of it.

MR: What do you do if a student comes to you with a recording that they really like and the drums and the percussion are all electronically created.

MM: Well, you know, as Duke Ellington once said, he said, "There's only two kinds of music: good music and bad music." All right? So it depends on what they're doing with it. I mean if it's musically, if there's something happening it's cool. I say great. I don't close

I mean if it's just thumping on one chord over and over again, the same, very uninteresting, I'm going to tell the student I mean I think this sucks. You know, "Get it off." But I mean you've got to keep an open mind. I mean if it's interesting, I mean I hear a lot of things that are you know, pretty cool, very well done, the use of electronic computer-style music.

MR: Do your students do that as part of their instruction?

MM: Not really. No we do formal training pretty much. Some of them do it on their own. Although we do have music technology courses where they use how to use Logic and some of the sequencing software. So they do learn to do that, right? And I think that has its place as well. So I try to understand that too because that can be a motive, a little income there. If you get good at it, you know, you could earn some money writing or doing some charts, or a track for somebody. We recently did a track for a friend of ours at Cirque du Soleil, an electronic kind of style. And we were commissioned to do that, so we did it. So it's good to understand that part of it too.

MR: Right. Put one more thing in the things you can do.

MM: Right. That's it.

MR: This is not a musical question, but how are you feeling about the state of our country these days.

MM: Right now?

MR: Yeah.

MM: Oh I think it's terrible. I think what's happening now with this administration is absolutely awful. I think it's a crying shame. And I was really, really, really disheartened, how this whole thing went down. I think it's awful, I really do. And he's going to start cutting down for the arts, and all those things, and those don't matter, we'll give money to the football teams and stuff like that, that's better And it's really sad. It's rough. Because I'm a political junkie. I watch the news all the time. Every day I've got to get up and see well what happened yesterday.

MR: Yeah.

MM: I'm always — but recently I actually switched the channel.

MR: Me too.

MM: Yeah. I can't believe what I am hearing and what I am seeing.

MR: Right. I feel like withdrawing.

MM: Yeah. It's like what the hell, what is this. People actually buy this?

MR: And you live in a state that has played like a role.

MM: Yes I know. I know. Yeah. That's another thing too. But one thing about being a musician, we're kind of our own community. And we kind of have our own little

I was a kid, like being a musician, that was always a place I could go to that made me feel good and I was comfortable. And I have friends in that same circle, right? So it was always a place of comfort. And it still is, even more so now.

MR: When you go home do you turn on music? Do you listen to music a lot?

MM: Sometimes yes. Sometimes we do. We recently haven't, because usually at dinner we try to turn off the news and listen to some music. You know I have some LPs and a turntable, and I like to check out some of the old LPs. But recently I've been listening to, while driving, I'm trying to put together a CD. I just recorded my first vibraphone CD, you know, I've been trying to play vibes for the last five or six years. I've always played mallets you know, but to put out a good, worthy, you know, some recognition that it's difficult. There's so much stuff out there. So many great players. So I've been listening and mixing and how am I going to do this or that. And I have to do another session, and get a few more tracks done. So that's what I've been listening to. I usually listen to music I'm working on, my own.

MR: Did you happen to work with Peter Appleyard?

MM: Yes.

MR: You were in Canada.

MM: Yes. He was a good musician.

MR: Yes he was.

MM: An excellent musician. A good player. And he actually was working with Benny Goodman and I sat in and played a set with Benny Goodman. So that was nice. Peter was a fine man. He really was a gentleman and when he wanted to he could really play. He was caught up in the theatrics a lot, but down deep he was a really good musician. Good player.

MR: And I see you played with Marian McPartland somewhere along the way.

MM: Yeah, yeah, back in the day, yeah I played with her. But what happened with Marian, that was during the time I was playing with Steve Kuhn and we had just done an album with Gary McFarland, a thing called "October Suite." Ron Carter was the bass player. And I was working with Marian. And I had to take a couple of nights off and I sent in a friend of mine to sub for me, right? A guy named Jimmy Capas. And then on the next gig he was on, so I got axed by Marian. But I think what happened was that I was maybe trying to stretch out a little bit too much. She wanted more mainstream, just a little more solid kind of, you know and I was young and a little bit cocky and I tried to push her a little bit.

MR: What was that thing Lester Young said —

MM: Where she didn't want to go.

MR: Some quote from Lester Young, "Just tickety-tick for Lester, don't be dropping no

MM: Yeah. I guess I got a little too adventurous. But she was really sweet. She sent me some sheet music, some tunes that I liked, and that's fine. Sometimes it just doesn't work out. And it didn't really bother me. Because I was playing with Steve Kuhn and Ron Carter.

MR: Yeah, that was some nice music.

MM: It was different.

MR: Well you know how to drive a big band, I can say that, because I've been rehearsing with this group tonight you know, and now I can put on my resume that I played with you.

MM: Okay. Cool.

MR: Do you have anything else that you'd like to add before we sign off.

MM: It's nice to be asked about my past and my history. I'm flattered every time somebody is interested. And I enjoy revisiting the days. And if somebody could learn something or get something out of it, that's great.

MR: Well I like what you said about attitude and bringing professionalism as well as friendship to the gig, because it just adds to the good karma.

MM: Absolutely.

MR: And sometimes it yields something down the road and sometimes it doesn't.

MM: Right. Well it doesn't matter, you made a friend and that's more important.

MR: And when you think about playing with Bill Evans and these other people, that's sort of like a basketball player getting to the NBA. For me, that's the way I think of how many people want to get there, and never quite do. So to have those experiences, you might not even realize it at the time. I think you probably do.

MM: Yes. Well I was walking on air when I got the gig with Bill. But after a while you did take it for granted. And I used to talk with Eddie sometimes and say man I wish he would play some different tunes, man. You know, that type of thing, where you get a little bit like jaded. But I appreciate it more now when I listen to some of the old recordings and I can actually be objective. Because back then I was never, I said man, I sound terrible.

MR: Really.

MM: Yeah. I really wasn't happening at all. But now I can listen and say well it wasn't too bad, it was pretty good actually. You know, you know what I mean, you are more objective now. So you know, in 1973 we did "The Bill Evans Album." And it was done at Columbia Studios, the famous studio on 30th Street, that's where "Kind of Blue" was recorded. Right? I mean it was an old church and it was the studio in New York to record. And Bill recorded there. And we did this session and I walk in and there's these blankets. They'd made a room for the drums. And I couldn't even see Bill. And they had like 15 mics on the drums. And they said do this and do that and tape this and you know. And I said but that's not my sound. "Oh no, no, don't worry, we're going to fix it in the mix."

to just go by whatever, he plays an intro and then I pick it up. And when I listened to the finished product it sounded like there were three guys playing in three different rooms. And that's what was happening. Right? Because there has to be a little bit of bleed to get that nice togetherness, where it sounds like one unit, not three separate guys, right? So I wasn't really happy with that at all, right? But wouldn't you know that recording won the Grammy award in 1973. So what the hell do I know?

MR: That's funny because I just was thinking, I was wondering if you'd ever run into like producers who wanted to do a thing a certain way and you say well musically that's not perhaps the best way to do this, and it's not the way we work, either.

MM: Well if you play music that's very personal to you, it's about your sound and what you are bringing to the table, then a good producer should see that and let that happen naturally. They want to put you in a box that sounds like everybody else. You know, give us the drum sound that everybody else gets. You know? So it depends on the kind of music. When we do the studio work it's kind of generic sounding, like pop, that kind of thing, yeah I can understand it, there's not a lot of personality, individual personality in that music. But on a jazz thing there's more talking going on and more conversation, you want to speak in terms about how you feel about things. And your sound is part of what you're bringing to the table. And when they try to change that up then I have a little problem with that.

MR: Well thanks for your time today.

MM: Well sure.

MR: I look forward to playing with you later tonight.

MM: Well thank you, appreciate it.
